

The Big Year

Written by Mark Shaffer

Tuesday, 27 January 2015 13:43

The 9th Beaufort International Film Festival

Raises the Bar.

By Mark Shaffer

"We have filmmakers every year who tell us that they're going to go home and make another movie just so they can come back to Beaufort. You can't beat that."

- Ron Tucker, Executive Director, Beaufort International Film Festival

The Big Year

Written by Mark Shaffer

Tuesday, 27 January 2015 13:43

This will be my 7th Beaufort International Film Festival. I might have made it to all nine, but I was on the west coast the first year and only just arrived in Beaufort for the second iteration. I didn't find out about the film festival until it was over. In fact, I later found out that most locals were completely oblivious to the fact that Beaufort even had a film festival. Perhaps this was partly due to location. In those early years BIFF took place across the river on Lady's Island in a former movie theater-turned-church. It didn't take long for the word of mouth to build and BIFF quickly gained a reputation as "the little film festival that could." Some filmmakers like Writer/Director/Producer/Actor Gary Weeks made Beaufort an annual habit (he's not missed one). Others like the husband & wife team of V.W. Sheick and Uyen Le came (left, with Weeks), came again, and then pulled up stakes in L.A. and moved to Beaufort (more on this next issue). All of the converted spread the gospel of BIFF among their brothers & sisters across the nation, and around the world. Pretty soon BIFF began to balloon like Kirstie Alley at a Vegas buffet. A move to the USCB Center for the Arts solved the space problem – for now – and positioned the fest in a waterfront venue on a historic campus within walking distance to shops, restaurants, inns and bars.

Last year a freak winter storm blew across the nation, shutting down airports and interstates and generally tossing a giant icy monkey wrench into the works. A lot of filmmakers and fans cooled their heels at home unable to find a flight or an open road. Some (presumably followers of Jim Cantore's Twitter feed) got here early and stayed late. And then there was Elizabeth Yoder. The L.A. based actress eventually made it to Beaufort after a harrowing and costly cross-country journey. "I would've hired a dogsled," she told me. Her diligence paid off with a Best Actress trophy and a slew of new friends and fresh connections. Even with most of the Southeast locked in a decidedly un-Disneyesque state of “Frozen,” attendance was up. Advance ticket sales for 2015 are far ahead of schedule according to Ron and Rebecca Tucker, the principals behind both BIFF and its parent organization, the Beaufort Film Society.

The Big Year

Written by Mark Shaffer

Tuesday, 27 January 2015 13:43

Gaffney, South Carolina native Andie MacDowell is among this year’s honorees. The star of “Sex, Lies & Videotape,” “Groundhog Day,” and “Four Weddings and a Funeral” will receive the inaugural Spirit & Pride of South Carolina Award from legendary author, Beaufort denizen, and occasional Lowcountry Weekly contributor, Pat Conroy (seen here with Blythe Danner, at BIFF 2010). All of this factors into a phenomenon we like to call the “pre-BIFF buzz.” If the indicators pan out, 2015 looks to be the most impressive festival yet. An unprecedented number of filmmakers are already booked and attendees can expect some surprises and at least one major announcement (which we will preview exclusively in the 2/11/15 BIFF issue). But the bottom line for festival goers this year is an intimate independent film experience like no other and, according to festival director Ron Tucker (above, with wife Rebecca), a chance to see BIFF achieve the next level.

COMING ATTRACTIONS

Mark Shaffer: Looking over the list of entries I’d say this is not only the most formidable slate I’ve seen across the board, but maybe the edgiest as well.

The Big Year

Written by Mark Shaffer

Tuesday, 27 January 2015 13:43

Ron Tucker: The quality of entries has been so much better this year. We want to find films that have an impact; that you're going to remember and talk about. It seems we always have a couple of films that people are still talking about three or four years down the road. This year I think people will agree with you. It's the strongest selection of films in every category that we've ever had. With all the filmmakers we've got coming my biggest concern right now is how to manage the Q&A between films.

MS: Much of this – indeed, a great deal of the festival's remarkable growth over the past few years – is due directly to word of mouth.

RT: The filmmakers who've come here and had a great time have told other filmmakers at other festivals about us. We've got a lot of films on this year's schedule because of that.

MS: This could also be the year of the character actor.

RT: That's right. We have names attached to films that people might recognize. Max Gail ("Barney Miller," "Judgement in Berlin," "42") stars in "The Frontier" and Ted Levine ("Silence of the Lambs," "Shutter Island," "The Bridge") is in "Dig Two Graves."

The Big Year

Written by Mark Shaffer

Tuesday, 27 January 2015 13:43

That film's director Hunter Adams is coming from L.A. along with his producer. I talked to him last night. Ted's starting a movie about that time, so he may not make it.

MS: And you've got talent coming from all over.

RT: One filmmaker's coming from Italy. Tim Driscoll, the young director who did a great job with "The Lengths" is coming from L.A. A couple of the actors are also coming, Corsica Wilson and Joshua Mikel, who are both up-and-comers. Melindi Fickel who co-wrote and directed "Suck it up, Buttercup" is flying in from Honolulu. Her lead actress, Lacie Marie Meyer, is coming from New York. And many, many more – most of them for the majority of the festival.

MS: In the feast or famine category, last year you simply opted out of doing a feature film category because you thought the quality was lacking.

RT: Last year we didn't think the feature entries were up to the standard of the other categories. This year is just the reverse. We had a number of features that didn't make the cut this year that definitely would have been finalists in years past. It's been a very strong year for features. And all of these are from fairly young directors. Some of them have already had success on the film festival circuit. "Suck it Up" has won some awards. So has "The Frontier"

and “The Lengths.” “Dig Two Graves” and “Cinema

Purgatorio” are just getting out there.

MS: The latter is a homegrown project out of Greenville and shot in the Charleston area. As it turns out there are quite a few finalists who won’t have far to drive this year and we’ll be highlighting some of them in the next issue.

RT: I think South Carolina’s represented in every category and has the majority of the screenplays.

MS: Last year we had the freak winter weather that kept a lot of people home, but remarkably the numbers didn’t drop. They actually went up. Are you expecting to make up for that this year with a major spike in attendance?

RT: I’m hoping for and expecting the numbers to spike for several reasons, chief among them is word of mouth. Every year I worry that no one’s going to show up. A week out I still hear locals asking, “When is it?” And that always scares me. But the word gets out. This year we started publicity earlier. Things like Tripadvisor have worked well. A lot of the hotels and inns now have film festival packages. But every year it goes back to the community getting involved and right when we need a hug the most, they put their arms around us. Even with the bad weather we still had around eight thousand people last year. And I expect those numbers to go up.

