

My husband Vince and I love Greek food! Whenever we travel, we always look for authentic Greek restaurants. One of our all-time favorite Greek dishes is Spanakopita. It's a vegetarian pastry made with spinach, feta cheese, phyllo dough and lots of butter. I started to wonder if I could find a similar recipe that featured chicken.

As it turns out, Kotopita (Greek Chicken Pie) is made almost the same way as Spanakopita. Diced chicken is tossed with parmesan and feta cheeses in a bechamel sauce and spread between layers of phyllo dough. It's delicious! Serve Kotopita with a classic Greek Salad for an honest-to-goodness Greek meal, Lowcountry style.

Don't forget the ouzo. Opa!

1/4 teaspoon ground nutmeg

1/2 (1 pound) package frozen phyllo dough, thawed in refrigerator

2 cups butter, melted

Combine chicken with parmesan cheese; set aside. Melt butter in a heavy saucepan over low heat; add onion, garlic and flour. Cook for 1 minute, stirring constantly. Gradually add milk; cook over medium heat, stirring constantly, until thickened and bubbly. Stir in whipping cream. Add chicken mixture, feta cheese, eggs, dill weed, salt, pepper and nutmeg. Mix well to combine. Butter a 9x13-inch baking dish. Layer 8 to 10 sheets of phyllo dough in the dish. Brush each sheet liberally with butter while assembling. Spread chicken mixture evenly over phyllo dough. Top with remaining sheets of phyllo, brushing each one with butter. Brush top sheet with butter and pour any remaining butter over the kotopita. Using a sharp knife, cut through kotopita into 12 servings. Bake in a preheated 350 degree oven for 45 to 50 minutes or until top crust golden brown. Serves 12.
